

A top-down view of a white surface covered with a variety of small, diverse objects. There are several smooth, rounded stones in various colors like grey, brown, and white. Two vibrant red autumn leaves are scattered among the items. Several coins, including a US quarter and a dime, are visible. A few small insects, including a beetle and a fly, are also present. A black pen with a silver clip lies horizontally across the lower right. A wooden object with horizontal grain is at the bottom center. The overall composition is a collage of natural and human-made elements.

Bones of the Earth

Bones of the Earth

Come close and we will speak
Of your shiny rock.
Bring me the stones chosen from all the others,
Those chosen for their shine,
Those Earth rumbled into glistening life.
See light with your Child eyes.

Put stones into my hand,
Warmed by the body of you.
Bring the stones of your life to me.
We will save them in crevices,
Where they will be covered by snow,
Where they will be washed by the rain.

Hold in your hand the stones of time.
Let me hear hope in your voice,
Banish worry from mine.
Hold your stones up to flash in the sun.
Let me know the stones given you,
Will be cherished.

Grandson

Taking your hand in mine, I rub my thumb Over your knuckles, Feeling small bones.
 You in my lap, there were no other chairs.
 I smooth your dress shirt over your back, Finding shoulder blades,
 The lovely channel of your neck.
 I pull your lengthening frame Closer to mine, rest my chin Upon your shoulder and find your ear with my face, My nose.
 I rub the downy cheek and you giggle Softly.
 If I blew gently down your neck you would squirm away.

We are in an audience, at a performance.
 You listen.
 I think of your wisdom, increasing As you count, name letters for me, how You run the silly flopping head of the six, your feet Too big, laughing as you turn to dare chase
 You will run away, and I cannot chase.
 I am
 Your audience.
 Let my holding you now
 Last a lifetime.

Red-Tail Hawk

One thing about the blue truck, Visibility,
Over all others in the road.
Through the cracked windshield, Skewing the view,

A bird,
Not moving his wings,
Perhaps setting the tiny bones
Of each side, he rising, circling Slowly into so blue autumn sky, Lifting above
Lights, motors, radio whining,

My thoughts
On failure that day, the betrayal
Of a friend, then you Bird, you living in the evening sky,
Fine spirit bird,
I see there, climbing Air currents effortlessly, then Clarity Enters my mind

Wood Stove

Let the fluted handle reveal holed circles.
Blow ashes from silver coals,
No warmth there.

All the shoveled back blackness
Held over from night, Grieves this morning's dim light.

Let hands rest on the blue black steel Driving cold to the bones.
No voices call from other rooms,
No oatmeal, no coffee.

Seek the woodpile, Grandmother.
Build some Comfort, sit down before the Stove's warmth, then Face this.
Look directly at the Flickering light.

Prayer Beads

Remember stringing beads, amber or jet
 On dental floss, pretending, Saying Hail Marys like Aunt Elaine did?
 Oh worship God tiny fingers Sliding off the threaded globes.

Look here. See those leafless trees, Used, empty bird nests in each Craggy intersection? Who will move in This spring, so far above the cat, see Black tracery of limb before Pink sunrise.

Beneath those trees run children, Holding hands, calling Names at her in the yellow feather hat.
Old lady with the yellow chicken head.
 She shakes a finger, forgetting,

Robin eggs are bluer
 Than any color, beads are smoother Than any stone, children will take another's Hand and run, run out Of all that black fractured sky,
 Of all the tired trees,
 Of all the strength that fails.

Sharon's Death

Jerking sleep initials the coming grief,
The letters are not of this language.

Oil glistens on a sun burnt fish, Mount Fuji Black lacquered on the silken sheaf.

No footsteps are heard, no call, instead
From the weeping room, a lily.

An interrupted voice, his smile collapses
At her liquid, lightless eyes.

Vomiting does not matter, neither does blood, Silence only has salt.

Spreading his fingers widely apart, he Views the silvered calligraphy.

This is the sound of the etched ivory clicking, Silence folding her wings.

Colors

Colors

Shucking peas,
I will try remembering this
To be saved
For another summer meal:
Hard green globes,
Tender circles that break Hemispherically.
Tongue finds the bud
Of tomorrow's seed.

See the trees there?
Blue on the blue, in time
Green grass will grow Upon my ribs.
I'll value my green earths.

Call me overcome and you would be right.
My hands cannot be patted to sleep.
Stroke my cheek,
As I have always asked.
I will watch, wondering

Where you were.

Ode to an Addiction

There it is, the rectangular package, Lift the slim cellophane slip and tear, Gently, oh so slowly, around the upper edge.
As it falls, fluttering, to the floor, begin Tearing the second silvery layer, Reveal white cellulose circles.
Tapping gently, urge one cylinder from the package, Lifting it up, take it between Fingers, smoothing the satiny paper, the aroma rises, Breathe deeply that sweet richness.

Carefully place the smooth white tube onto the edge Of lips, open the cardboard book, expose Small paper stems topped with heads of red, Twist one loose, hold it between finger and thumb, Draw it sharply along the rough edge Snapping it to sudden burst of flame.
Hold flame steady, guard and guide to There, just touch the end, watch the sudden red glow, Pull breath through softly, exhale.

Remove the cylinder. Admire its length, smoothness.
Hold it between second and third finger, Remember the touch.
See the gray curl of smoke? Place it between Moist lips. Touch tongue to its center, Breathe in mouth and nostril, pull the point To hot glow, deep deep breath, closing eyes, Taste the acrid bitterness in lungs, in mouth.
Burn the whole length, burn it all, burn.

Bare Knees

For Ray

We watched the thermometer fall
In slow motion to shatter On the kitchen's black and yellow linoleum floor.
Kneeling, we gathered,
Tiny globes to meet,
When nudged, to merge,
Into larger balls, until one gleaming sphere Reflected our distended faces.
We pushed the globule,
With toothpicks, both of us.
Tongues pressed to our lips in concentration, Easing the gathering over the hump Into an old aspirin bottle.
Triumphant, we sat back on our heels.
Rolling the quicksilver around And around.
God said He would catch every tear
And count them.
Whose tears were those?
god-like
We would catch and reassemble
Every silver orb,
Take turns shaking them apart,
Twisting the bottle,
Rolling them together.
Those were some heavy tears.

Lost Purse

The green brick wall is hot tonight, Radiating defiance at the bluing clouds
In the dusk sky, frothy with rain possibilities.
I think of the air, enveloping, soft,
Moving against my skin, Wonder if fish think of water touch, this comfort of surround.

Across the street a blue light flickers,
A small television set,
Someone is watching in a camper Parked in the lot there, this July evening.
Perhaps no parking fees,
All accoutrements within, a home on wheels Never dreamed by Gypsies.

At the Depot, guitar music, colored lights hang Loosely grouped outside. I feel smug About the small downtown.
Cafes, antiques and paint chipped windows above, Sculpture on corners, trees, yardlets of flowers Tended by city workers on tricycle trucks.
I walk to the classroom, unlock the room
I hope contains my purse.
It is where I left it, Sprawled like a half empty wine flask.

We drive to the Sonic with our windows down, Summer night slides by my face,
Years of summer nights,
Driving up and down the one main street town.
I talk to Ed of this, we order limeade, Watch the girls skate the orders out,
Sit together in the comfort of the surround.

Three is More Than a Tricycle

MacBeth's witches cast three spells, Three wise men sought the child,
 Children gain three names at birth.

Et Cetera, abbreviated; early easy Words,
 Fun, cat, mom

Gives three cookies, watch Huey, Dewey, Louie, Graduate to Larry, Curley, and Moe, SOS
 Dot dot dot, dash dash dash, dot dot dot, God

Is three letters, good words joy, hum, Play tic tac toe, three strikes you're out,
 Three outs an inning, triage

Saves a life, Father, Son and Holy Ghost.
 Triangle calls the hands for supper, prime Sum of one and two, common palindromes,

Three coins in the fountain, knock Three times on the ceiling if you want me, Colors of the flag, telephone prefixes, area codes.

Tricorn hat of Paul Revere, Work horse wheelbarrow, third call on Rock, scissors, paper, Olympic medals.

Triumph begins with tri, traffic Lights: stop, wait, go.
 Three squares a day.

Earth, moon, sun, wishing Three wishes, waltzing, Slow.

Columbine High School

Just fifty miles away.
I didn't tell ninth hour what was happening to kids like them just fifty miles away, I thought, purposefully, that if I did, they would react, erupt even with questions I couldn't answer
then after they left I turned on the television, one scene of a mom holding her daughter alive.

I turned it off, drove home
searched stations, voices to explain what was happening not fifty miles away, wondered was this the anniversary of the bombing in Oklahoma City, no, today was the 20th, I wrote April 20th on the board just this morning, thinking what is it about the 20th I should remember, someone's birthday
then
I turned to,
then, the day happened, news began at lunch in the teacher's lounge no-one talked, reluctant, waiting.

I kept thinking about Dad, who wanted me to be a teacher, not a nurse, because nursing was too hard, this pay steady, how when I started teaching in 1962, how no-one ever dreamed it could be a place where children, teachers could be in danger

then on the way home I kept looking for commentators to tell me what had happened-- give me reasons, explain those children being shot my God, with shotguns in their school here
just fifty miles away, here people said all day, it could happen anywhere, even here, but most it's fear of a world where children cannot be safe, where anger, vengeance, bitterness...

at home
then
I walk out to see the just blossoming Hopi crabapple tree, the unfurling tulips touch, then past scenes of schools riddled, no, not schools, children and teachers torn by bullets from guns shot by children repeat, like the gun, repeat, the sophomore said on the radio, we heard automatic weapons firing, we ran, he recognized the sound--
then
I think what would I do in my classroom, lock the door, tell the kids get under the desks, like we did in the 50's, duck and cover for safety from the atomic bomb, we talked about that today in teacher team meeting, others laughed at the absurdity, we did believe that would save us, watch for the flash the white flash of light, know

then duck, hold hands over your neck, curl into a ball,
curl the fetal position, we would have been found incinerated in the position
then these children,
fifty miles away,
it is too real,
then,
steps we will surely take at our school to prepare for the awful, then new warnings we must give our classes

then how will tomorrow be they will ask,
why did it happen how do I answer
what no-one can answer,
explain grief,
sorrow at such hatred, this question, this teacher, has no answer.

Summer Dreams

A Pantoum

I am trying to get up from a vinyl chair,
 Wearing shorts on a July afternoon.
 Fixing you with my vacant stare,
 Peeling both skin and sensation.

Wearing shorts on a July afternoon,
 My bare legs, bare hopes
 Peeling both skin and sensation,
 You said, if it is ok with you,

My bare legs, bare hopes
 I will go into town, get a bus ticket.
 You said if it is ok with you.
 I will call when I find my own way.

I will go into town, get a bus ticket,
 Whenever I get there
 I will call when I find my own way.
 Wherever that is, I think.

Whenever I get there,
 The screen door hushes shut,
 Whenever that is, I think,
 You never fixed that door.

The screen door hushes shut,
 Red rectangles of chair print--
 You never fixed that door
 The backs of my legs

Sting in the July heat,
 I am trying to get up from a vinyl chair,
 Like I had just been slapped, Fixing you with my vacant stare.

Stick Man

The forgotten line
I had just last week
Dances around the ice of my brain Locked in a foggy vapor there,
About a man
Father perhaps,
Had power,
Felt it growing Into such a piece.
It will not return to me.
Do a memory trick.
Construct a stick man,
A balloon head,
No eyes, none necessary,
Arms, legs, fingers, dexterity required.
Talk to the little man, give him
A small paper, pencil, say Go, find what I am looking for,
The moment once had,
Go find, fetch that idea.
Send this little man walking up
The imaginary path, watch Him walk slowly up and over a hill, Trudging along, peering carefully, first left,
Then right, never back where I am watching,
No hips, bony arms and legs, puffballs of feet walk Up the hill, let him walk slowly over the edge, Over the verge,
Over the corner of my mind, in my memory
He is rummaging.
I wait for his return,
Bearing a piece of paper
On which is written that line
I had for the poem
I never wrote.

For The Land

For The Land

Alone each night, he walks
From the barn, machine shed, or shop, Leaving the silent tractor
In the field.

His meals are simple,
Bread meat potatoes.
At times the wife of the hired man Brings him hot apple pies.

He eats on the oil-clothed table,
Mail stacked against the wall.
He has wrapped his mother's silver,
Put it away.

The calendar above him
January of one year
Yellowing his seasons.
Sun reaches that window
Over the old stone sink.
Spring again.

He moves to the old rocker On the porch at dusk, listens to Night come, then Lifts his body slowly, a Shuffling shadow,
Pushes one leg upstairs,
One bare wooden tread
At a time.

That Place

I.

If I could, I would walk through,
 Touch the stippled walls,
 Look out the dining room bay window at the neighbor's summer corn
 Growing beside Chinese elms,
 The ground rumbled by old roots.
 Walk to the porch, sit on the concrete step, look north to distant blue Glimmer of lake,
 Feel the cool concrete against my legs,
 Listen to cattle murmuring in the corrals,
 The clang of gates shutting out back,
 Children working the calves.

In the kitchen
 Watch fall's shaft of light slide across the floor, then To the family room, see snow blow across the barn eave.
 If I have time I shall go upstairs, Thanking God as I always did for a day
 Once more in that place.
 Knowing the days were numbered to Our bedrooms and pause before each door,
 The yellow curtains, the white Priscillas, the blue sheers At our west windows, to touch the Enameled corner woodwork, toe the lined wooden floor, Hear the voices
 Of ours, of ours,
 Finding understanding in Those days.

II.

They walked side by side ignoring Impending tomorrows.
Ignoring reality. Instead Lying silently, side by side, Awaking nestled as spoons,
Wind blowing the curtains
Sweet time to get ready,
Time to begin packing the days,
Time to go,
Time to pull on the boots, gather sunburn.
Time to feel muscles tired from work,
Tired from hoping beyond.

Disappointment settled In eddies of further days. New days, New lives. A tiny hand Takes mine and asks to go to our home.
Another home, not the place we wanted
So desperately
We would have done anything
Within our human power
To keep—that place.

Red

Good, the rain from the west washed the white Bird splat from my window.
 Good, I find an acceptable station on FM,
 One that is not buzzing.
 Good, Sunday dinner simmers in the oven, Smells of garlic and rice vinegar.
 Good, the hills beyond grow green, the trees below
 My window bud.
 A boy plays below with his golden retriever,
 Do they play?
 Is the dog attacking?
 I study them, boy chases dog, dog waves his Plume of a tail,
 Barks, down on forelegs, laughing his dog laugh, Boy claps, laughing.

Good God, good.

Jimmy carried Sugar on his shoulders, draped Around his neck,
 White cat comfortable there,
 Riding the red three wheeler to chores,
 His soft voice, her soft whiskers tickling His ears and cheek.

Silo Road

There was a thunderstorm.
 Late evening heads of white making way To rain, rain, hail,
 Wind stinging cold, we huddled Under your jacket in the back of the hay filled wagon.
 Others watched us, curious at your new love.
 I was frightened at the dark gypsy girl Who had run to you when we arrived.

A tall gray silo marked the graveled road
 Now running with rivulets.
 Your brother drove the tractor, chugging up the hill,
 We go in streaming
 Hair and noise, your mother asking if I want dry shoes, Gasping at the size of my feet.
 I felt large in the small farmhouse, Warmed myself before the propane heater.

You would love me, despite your beautiful cousin,
 Your silent family.
 In the only bathroom I would bathe alone,
 Dry with towels that were so thin,
 Crisp from having dried in the sun, so clean the sunrise Inside your eyes when you looked at the land.

Tonight I drove the same road,
 Now covered with asphalt.
 You said turn, go past where the farmhouse was.
Stop there on the side of the road, see, they've left that All in a pile,
I'll see if I can find some boards to use,
I want to make a shed for a Nativity.

You wrenched rusty nails from silvered planks Weathered by the years between time.

I asked what was here, there's the silo.
You looked at me, swept your arm through air,
This was the feed lot,
Bend back to your work.
I turn west to the mountains,
The evening
Highway a whizzing race of traffic.

I watch as you pull old boards from a Balled up heap of metal and rust.
What you build could mean nothing to our children,
Perhaps a smiling
Regret to your brothers, sisters.
The kochia weed grows tall and green,
This infant ball of tumbleweed.
Wind will blow it this fall Into the looming houses on the farmland hills.

A Man had A Wife

A man had a wife
who had never lived in the country.
He knew she would not understand for some time unless he could find a way to show her.

He wakes her one clear morning before dawn, moon glowing a pathway, he uses no headlights, drives them into the fields, bumping through damp earth smells into the warm August morning.

She looks over to see his hand holding a white kitchen towel, he asks her to tie it around her eyes, and she does, smelling the summer sun in its soft folds.

He stops,
walks around to her door,
helps her out, then kneels to remove her shoes.
She senses her body, her lips, air cool on her back and legs as he leads her into the night.

He murmurs words to her, stand here and listen.
It will be dawn,
I will not be far away from you, stand here, listen, when you must,
take the blindfold off.

Her feet on warm soft earth, she turns her head birdlike into the silence, hears a faraway dog barking, some small rustle of leaves, waiting then, the slow sense of light beneath her closed eyes, she knows dawn is beginning.

She holds herself still, loving him fiercely, tucks her chin to hear more exactly sun rising, birds begin dawn calls, a slight breeze stirs her dark hair, warmth on her back, sun.

She hears a memory of a full taffeta skirt, shushing and rustling and whispering, sun warm, sounds full,
she pulls the blindfold from her eyes.

Blinks as light dazzles her, looks up to giant sunflower heads golden platters turn to the rising sun.
She reaches up,
lifts her hands to cup the flowering sun.

Generations

Generations

Two women are going through a blanket box, Looking for photograph albums, Finding black leaves holding Gray portraits, here

On the high plains,
Two boys sit at the Platte River's edge, Eating watermelon grown by their father, Squinting into the sun.
Mouths grinning,
That moment
The river is muddy.

Arms are held away from their bodies, Finely made and small,
So juice can drip
Over bare feet.
Spit black seeds,
With neighbors so scarce
Anyone becomes a cousin.

About Buttons

In the oak rocker that sits in my bedroom, Once,
Great-Grandma Ritchie sat
Before the windows
In my Grandmother's dining room.
Visiting that summer, she Gathered all the buttons saved Over all the years.

As she rocked, she sorted Tiny green tulips,
Old uniform buttons, white daisy buttons,
Black jet buttons, homely
Two and four holed shirt buttons, pearly pink hearts, One large amber button with a faded gold edge.

With needle and thread she looped them Formed a loosely boned family of circles, Gently clicking and sliding together on a string, Nestled all the buttons in a blue crackled tin.

I think About the hands that cut them
From pink wool cape,
Or eyelet Easter dress, Dad's church shirt, the collar
Already turned once.
From daughter's button up the back Pink party dress,
Or gray herringbone winter coat.

Cut from cloth other's hands have smoothed, Pulled around shoulders, held Close to feel the beating heart beneath.

Great Grandma Ritchie, Grandma Baker,
Who cut with tiny silver scissors,
Who gathered loops of thread,
Gone now, leaving only my hands
To close the blue tin box Once more.

Myrtle C. Dinsmore Price

Myrtle Price was 90 today, and herself.
Enough to roll her eyes at us
When her daughters hauled her off For pictures.
Does she think of each day?
Or go on as we do, accomplishing work
That must be done.
Those
We love and do not.

Killing the buffalo and skinning the carcass, Cleaning blood and flesh from the hide Needed to keep our Monuments, ant homes, caves, malls.
Build rituals for birth, death, Sober,
Truth on wooden crosses.
Bless books,
Invent self-control for 2 a.m.
Name others to take what we wish we could.
Then look, startle
At the white face moon.

The Deaths of Two Women

Second cousin Grace
Died the spring of her senior year.
Sent out to gather in the cows,
Her horse stumbled, threw her, broke her neck.
First cousin Lois, at the funeral, Comforted me.
She lost her own daughter three years later To leukemia.
I'm a cousin that lived.

Ila looked like bark Having laid in the sun for two days Dead.
Manic depressive, who knows what happened to her In the middle of a pasture
In the middle of Wyoming Along with a bottle of lithium.

The preacher said at her funeral,
Such a death should cause us
To re-examine our own lives.
I wanted to Re-examine hers.
We buried her on top
A windy mountain with A view we said Stretched to eternity.

Immigrants Upraised

From a photograph seen in the Loveland, Colorado Museum and Gallery

You know you are pretty, it's in the way
 You hold your head,
 Your eyes
 Agree with the smile on your mouth.
 Your long dress is blue Beneath the white apron.
 Hair combed behind your ears
 From a narrow center part.
 You hold a sugar beet, a long Wicked knife.
 Proud,
 Farm daughter.

Mother beside, surely, her full lips the same.
 Eyes blacker, no lights dance there, her body is thick.
 The part of her hair is wide and white after Years of brushing it out of the way, holding Her sugar beet, her knife.
 Hands loose, small sister stands
 By the wagon.
 Long curls, a short dress, a smaller apron,
 Will be prettier.
 Brother is behind holding a Handful of reins on a stocky black horse, over A way behind two more horses and a digger Your father's face.
 It is also your face.
 He looks boldly at the camera with your lifted chin, Understands how this moment Will last.

Composition

Pickup truck traveling too fast Across the bridge, the trailer weaving,
The van full of family following,
We before,
We watching, as in all moments,
In slow motion the blue van, in the rear view window in the side mirror Tipping slowly onto its flat nose we Just in front
Just having passed
Just having escaped in time.
Van wheeling through the ditch, Dirt showers those behind Truck sliding through the roadside flat Van tumbling into our just past, Sedan racing ahead to the nearest farmhouse We move in The bubble.
Seeking the last note
The composer wafts sound Through our song sense, Stops just short
Which we, obligingly, Finish in our mind.

Good Words

Born of the depression, dustbowl times was hard, Grandma saved cream pennies in a chipped china cup, Sent her boy to Sterling to hear John Phillip Sousa.
 Men sold windfall apples on the city corner, Days darkened at noon, clouds loomed in the west, Women stuffed rags into every small place, Wind blew topsoil through every little crack.

Rhyming words were invented, humor sought To ease the pain,
 Men's thumbs in overalls, women's heads together, Catching up news on a Saturday night.
 Jake's old mother died, least she suffers no more.
 Looks like Ben'll lose the farm, better'n his family.
 Little John wrecked the truck, glad it weren't him.
 Hear Harry's getting a divorce, Blessing they had no kids.
 Milk cow died, yup, least she was close by the gate.
 Sam married Clara, glad they didn't ruin two families.
 Guy next place over, tornado took the house,
 Still got machinery.
 My wells gone dry, good thing harvests in,
 Got time to dig.
 Told the wife the crops is hailed,
 Got time to fix up the place,
 Sure to be good pheasant hunting this fall.
 Mom said to Sadie just today,
 "If you're gonna break a dish, Make sure it's a dirty one."
 Nothings so bad but what it could be worse,
 From birth 'til the day you ride in the hearse.

Communion

She said she was awakened by music when I asked her if she heard the birds in the locust trees, she tilted her blonde head to listen.

He wants to play a card game tries to stack the deck, asks why we can't make up our own rules.

The envelope of your life opens, for your children you pray good days.
I hold my wishes more than wishes, stop, hold the time I held you, the still memory flashes into yesterday.

Don't want to play this card, he says don't want to clean my room, she says, don't want to move on, I think don't want to step up to tomorrow stay this moment.

The atmosphere rests on my arms, the dog wants to go for a walk, the air conditioner drips water, the colorless communion wine of the desert.

In the Moon of the Black Cherry

Tatanka Hasha was the chief of the tribe massacred by U.S. troops at Summit Springs near Atwood, Colorado, near Sterling, Colorado, near a dirt ravined hill.

A cement and stone monument is planted on the rolling sandhills of sage and grass, beside it a sheer plinth of rock to honor the fifteen year old nameless boy who stampeded his tribe's horses through the camp so his people could run to safety. The spear of granite stands there to honor him beside the brass plaque placed in the moon of the black cherry.

Leland Baker bought the farm in the sandhills a few miles away in 1920 for $10,000 and sent for his wife and children to come on the immigrant train from lush black-earth Iowa. Come to this sea of hills, brown and gray to blue and green, to cut the sod and stand looking to the afternoon sun feeling the hot wind blow her skirts and tendrils of hair that reminded her of herself as she tucked it back neatly and thought of the work that must always be done and the plow cutting the sandy ground into bleeding ribbons giving up years of accumulation of moisture seeded to short stands of corn prayed over, grow please.

Tatanka Hasha did not grow corn here, only Leland Baker tried...Charley Robertson, Lee Kimler, Chick Tunnison, Fred Davis, others. Build a store, a school, a church, came in horse or wagon to be with others who grew poor corn, raised narrow hogs, peckish chickens and splendid watermelon.

Veylerd Baker, Leland's third living son, comes here sometimes. Family comes too, walks over the foundations of houses long gone, startling grasshoppers, climbs through fences that govern the land once given to plow, now returned to grazing cattle.

Tatanka Hasha had over 400 horses and mules that day. The army took them.

Leland Baker had one pony and car, a touring car the boys drove to school even in winter, the car pulled by the horse through drifts to the road. They were fourteen and nine then, rode down miles of country blizzarding to school.

Leland Baker sold the farm in 1932 for $500 and moved to town to run a grocery store.

Veylerd Baker learned to fly in his fifties and flew his older brother over where they had lived, his turn to drive.

Tatanka Hasha lost his life. His tribe of fortyfour or so people lost theirs, man woman child to dog soldiers who wanted his land for their people

Fifty years later, their people struggled to cause the land to become Iowa.

The monument stands beside a graveled road. Some days people come to read the words. Smooth rocks have fallen from the cement of the pillar to clutter the ground. The wind blows.

In October of 1864, the soldiers of Kit Carson begin the long walk, the Hweeldi, for the Navajo people, driving them to a reservation in New Mexico, Bosque Redondo. Cutting their orchards of peach trees and killing the livestock, they leave the land desolate. Some of the Navajo, the Dine' or "the people" take refuge on a 25 acre rock summit, make camp on a thrusting fin of a rock, 700 feet above Canyon De Chelly. Carrying two 80 foot pine logs to use as ladders, and using gouged sequences of steps made centuries before by the Anasazi, 300 people climb to the top. After several fruitless efforts to capture the Dine', a group of soldiers are left to stand guard at the base of the cliff to await the surrender. In February, the Dine' run out of water.

The People

I.

One cold night in February, 1865 a woman speaks, Grandfather, the potholes are dry, our children...
 Tsaille Creek runs below at the base of the north cliff, the soldiers camp on the south, the river licks her wet mouth against sandstone behind them and we, must find a way to water.
 Over the edge we see glow of their campfire, water lapping the base of our world, many steps above those who wait to take our way of life.

If we go back, they will kill us.
 They chopped down all the peach trees, thousands of peach trees our fathers and mothers planted.

We came here bringing our dried peaches and meat, our pinon nuts,
our corn, our beans,
our children up the long pole carried over miles of desert, placed at the cliff so all could climb to stay, until they leave, stay our lives, stay our people,
the Dine'.

All we need, she speaks softly, is water to us, grandfather,
a way to get water to us, the potholes are empty, there is no snow,
no rain, the water pots dry, children are dying, the river is life, the river is below, we must dip the water pots to the river, bring the water to us.

II.

She and the women weave leaves of the yucca, plaiting fiber into rope while men at the cliff edge plan the way down the cliff face.
It will take many handing pots of water the full face of the wind rippled rock.

Night comes, rope beneath the arms of many,
they walk to their descent, the woman holds her silent child, grandfather holds her shoulder.

Only the whisper of moccasin on gravel, one by one, they place their bodies down the cliff, handing the rope,
Pots on to the next,
on to the last man,
standing on a narrow ledge above the creek.
Two sentries sleep beside the campfire.

He lowers a pot hand over hand, feels the pot sink,
grow heavy, gathers the rope, lifts the pot over his head to the man above him, ties on an empty pot, lowers it to fill.
Above him, men lift pots brimming with river water.
Through the long night, no pot is ever dropped,
no stone clatters loose,
no water is spilled,
no sound is made,
no man falls,
silent stars dance,
the Dine' are the people.

Fisherman

Fisherman

Trout leap,
Sun slips,
Darkening the lake.
Canoe and fisherman, he

Stitching line through Silver silk, he Reels in, casts out, glistening Beads wrap
The rod, the boat,
The water.

Moon unrolls a pathway,
Canoe and fisherman,
Glide
Sharp black silhouette, Across
The satiny, Glass skin.

There Are These Hands

You are right. I never did write a poem about you, Specifically.

The words I have written are You.

They are my hands, the blue veins running stitches by tendons,
No longer milky smooth,
Knuckles becoming larger from gripping life,
The ring I wear white gold against the blue.

You want to hear about love.
This is.

You want the bottom line, Cut through the other stuff,
Cut to the bone.

You are my bone, my breath, my pulse.
Your being cannot be gone from me,
Cannot be left from my everyday doing.

I want to tell you this more than anything
I have ever said to you.

These hands that have held you,
Have reached for you in the night,
Have known your soul's breath—
Become my breath.

Shall you want flowers,
That kind of poetry, of musically pretty patterns?
I cannot say it.
I cannot tell you surface when you are depth.
I will return to my hands.
There are these hands.

Song

I wish I could draw your hands, Black upon white threaded paper, Smudging reality to understanding,
The picture would change Over time.

I wish I could sing, just open my lips, Crushed smoke
Would come lull you.

I wish I could rest
My hands upon ivory keys,
Wait until the moment to play melody
That would weave forever Into your bones.

I wish I could dance,
Turn into the light of your gaze,
Extend my fingertips to touch your mouth, Spin away to leap Long legged onto boards worn smooth
By my feet.

I wish I could walk through you,
Rest, a trembling bird
Inside your soul
Listen to you breathe,
See your day through your eyes,
Silent there,
Until I knew you more than I know anyone,
Anyone, anyone.

I Bought Pistachios At The Roadside Stand

A Sestina

I bought pistachios at the roadside stand.
The clerk weighed the bag and asked of me,
Is he a seven-dollar kind of man?

They are priced by the pound and not the bag,
The sign on that box is misleading, see?
I bought pistachios at the roadside stand.

She waits as I consider the cost, and then Turns her head to watch him walk to me.
Is he a seven-dollar kind of man?

My thoughts tumble, her question unplanned.
The first instinct is to whisper quietly,
I will buy pistachios at the roadside stand.

You see, he is my husband, lifelong mate, We've been years together and I know that he Is a seven-dollar kind of man.

The moments at night when he takes my hand Grant me knowledge of a marriage well spent.
I bought pistachios at the roadside stand
For Ed, a seven dollar kind of man.

Rules

Rules

Look up words when there is time.
Wait until the end of a discussion, sum up.
Put things in logical places, (All work in the blue notebook)
Look obsessively for all work in all the files.
Discover the blue notebook when finished.
Remember I forget.

Resent those who interrupt
When the muse is in.
Stay calm.
Wait until tomorrow, it may be better.
Tomorrows grow fewer.

Realize the old man looking me over,
Is looking at an older woman.
Rest absolutely.
Watch others walk away.
Let them.
Sympathize.
Wish I had someone who would rub my feet.
Procrastinate in an orderly fashion.
Write on Sunday.

Accumulate nothing useless to me,
Resist double negatives.
Value comeuppances.
Appreciate leanness of possessions,
Repetitive chores, Weeds.

After All These Years

Invited to spend the night In the country, with a classmate,
We are eight or nine.
Her father at the table
In bib overalls sipping coffee, her mother
At the stove, they are talking.

It is not night yet,
Sun is at the windows on the west,
Paned and low in the wall.
I see violets on the windowsill, Thick leaves bristle, then Above a glow as sun slides Over crimson, glowing beads.
A bracelet placed on the narrow shelf
Just at my eye's level.

I reach for the mass of ruby light.
It is wrong; it is lovely.
Holding it in my hand,
Turning it over
The color changes as it moves, Shimmers on my pale palm.
Breathing softly, I sigh, wish,
Succumb, slip it in my pocket.
One pocket still heavy
After all these years.

one truth

my name is not who I am,
it is my mother saying when she had made me of Veylerd and Ruth.

it is too many letters to fit onto the locket chain, it is white grapes, white daisies, tasteful crystal vases.

it is joined at the hip souling with tall red-headed Barbara, sophomore sights of adulthood, walking the large gentle dog.

it's grandmother (one name after) whispering from the hospital bed my name once pink and gold, now silver and black.

it is promised seasons on a tumultuous rocky beach become manila file numbers on lemon parchment successive suppressed sorrows.

it became thee from the altar after the gather of words after wood smoke and coffee after all the gathering of name.

it changes again at birthing typed onto the slippery bracelet, saved in the yellowing book.

it will be sipped as dark tea, scarlet sumac in fall, once green-- walked easy through long descending hallways of sown sound.
